

By applying both act utilitarianism and rule utilitarianism, the hospital should give the bed to 25 year Olds. Both the theories suggest the same decision as they are closely related. The old man with chronic illness is already on his way to death. Saving him is a futile exercise, a waste of hospital resources (by the theory). If a 25 year old medical student, he can be a good doctor and can save many other lives. Which will make more people happy. As by the theory an action is right, if it creates great pleasure for great number of people. A 70 year old with chronic illness can produce no economic value. While a 25 year old can produce much economic value. By rule utilitarianism, this rule that a young student can be prioritized over the old man, is also right, as the rule says, that if the action is universally followed it will create greater good for the greatest number of people.

I think better approach would be to

b) The social contract is an agreement between people to abide by certain laws so they can benefit from the rights the society give to the person. By social contract theory it is actually a right thing if a whistleblower reveal the corruption. People pay taxes as they trust the government. That the government will provide them with basic rights. People must know where their money is going and how it is spent. Corruption is actually the breaking of the social contract theory. As Edward Snowden a famous whistleblower once said, "when exposing a crime is treated as doing a crime then you're being ruled by criminals".

i) the case about laws is that, they may or may not be bound to any ethical framework. Sometimes by the ethical framework. An action is wrong but by the law of country it is right (e.g usury) and opposite is also possible. (e.g stealing to save a man's life). Hence it maybe ethical to break the law, if it undermines society's well being.

ii) a society should draw the line where unnecessary chaos is intended. Some may whistle blow, just to bait the people into fighting. Or for their personal benefits (like shorting in stock market).

c) yes it aligns with ethical egoism, ethical egoism, suggest an action is right if it is beneficial to you. Self interest is the most important interest. When you prioritize your career and well being over the family obligations, it maybe better for you. As good career leads to a happy life.

II) the possible criticism for it is that Man's only purpose is not getting only himself better, but also to make the life better for people around him better. As it is said happiness is only real when it is shared. A man must look after his family, just like his family look after him. Family provides emotional and social strength to the person. Parents raise their child. It is an obligation for the person, to give them something in return. To compromise somewhere.
