Scenario #1:
A hospital Bed

i) By applying both act utilitarianism and Rule utilitarianism, the hospital should give the bed to 25 year old medical student. Both the theories suggest same decision as they are closely related.

The old man with chronic illness at 70 is already dying. Act utilitarianism says an act is right if it produces great pleasure for greater number of people. A 70 year old man can't contribute much economic value to the society. Saving him is a futile exercise. Waste of hospital resources. On the other hand If a 25 year old student is treated, he can be a good doctor and save many lives. And contribute much to society. Hence, this would be right action on criteria of act utilitarianism.

By rule utilitarianism, this rule that young student can be prioritized over the old man in healthcare, is also right, as the rule utilitarianism says if an action if universally followed will create greater good for greatest number of people.

ii) The better approach would be rule utilitarianism as it provides robust and scalable system for allocating scarce resources. But professionals should strive for a balanced approach inclined towards empathy to deal with moral dilemmas and achieve greater beneficence and justice for all involved.

Scenario #2

A whistleblower

The social contract is an agreement between people to abide by certain laws so they can benefit from the rights that society has due to them. By this social contract theory it is actually a right thing if a whistleblower reveal the corruption inside the systems.

People pay taxes as they trust the government, that government will provide them with basic rights of health and education. People must know how government spends their money. It is right of the people that their money is spend on them. But corruption may do the opposite. Corruption is actually the breaking of social contract. Hence it is right to expose and whistleblow the corruption.

i) The case for laws is that they may or may not be bound to any ethical framework. Sometimes an action is wrong by ethical theory but legal by law (e.g. usury is haram in Islam but legal in Pakistan) and the opposite is also true (e.g. stealing to save a man's life). Hence it maybe ethical to break the law if it undermines society's well being.

ii) A society should draw the line where unnecessary chaos is intended. Some may whistleblow only for their personal benefits (e.g. shorting in stock market).

Scenario #3 Career and Family

i) Yes, it does align with ethical egoism that prioritizing one's career over family obligations. As ethical egoism suggest that an action is right if it is beneficial to you. Self-interest is the only important interest. when you prioritize your career and well being over the family obligation, it may prove better for you. As good career leads to a happy life.

ii) The possible criticism for it is that man's only purpose here is not only himself getting better. He has also to make life better for people around him. As it said "Happiness is only real when it's shared." A man must look after his family, just like his family look after him. Parents raise the child. Family provides emotional and social strength to person. It is an obligation to give them something in return. To compromise somewhere before family.
